

GATH AT THE FAIR

Townsend Tells of Some Mistakes Past and Present.

REASONS FOR HARD TIMES

Something About the National Commission and Its Powers—Work of the Jury of Awards.

As we will have more world's fairs in the future, having had but three up to date, it might be well for some one to compile the story of the obstructions, misdirections and false starts in the present enterprise.

Townsend, the national commission, so-called, has a political flavor about it. Unless men are rich, or live frugally, they are not going to bestow six months of their time upon the mere matter of awards at a fair, unless they have somebody to serve, or some notion of recompense.

The Philadelphia fair of 1876 was marked by the same important confidence between the local boards and the national board. The Philadelphia board who had to raise the money for the fair, and whose genius and energy raised the great buildings, these looked upon the outsiders who came clothed with a national badge. I remember that Dobbins, the builder of the large buildings, said: "We can get along with Goshorn but, my God, don't send us anybody else!"

Having disturbed the fair to the height of their powers, the so-called national commission and congress turned their backs upon it at the conclusion, and the Philadelphia lost all the money they subscribed to the project. At one or two of the foreign fairs, and especially in France, suspicion have been entertained of the integrity of the jury of awards. In the present age an exaggerated importance is given to the medals, honorable mentions, etc., of such an exhibition. France being a republic, and subject to the same temptations and want of restraint and of corrections as our own country, the American exhibitors did not like the way the Frenchmen danced around them, as if they would like to become personally acquainted before they tested the merits of the articles displayed. Yet, there was no scandal in the sequence, and perhaps this exhibition will turn out all right. The arbitrary man who undertakes to impose his views of conferring medals and favors is generally a nuisance.

I spoke to one of the national commission the day they came to some solution of the method of giving awards, and he said: "Mr. Townsend is right. Congress said that this should not be a competitive fair. People came here who wanted their history to be taken into consideration; that they had made certain products for a long period of time, and were not therefore to be measured with some special product which might be very carefully prepared solely for the exhibit here." Probably, in the long run, the people will have very little about medals obtained from exhibitions. The piano people have been the principal quarrelers on the ground, and places in America come under the head of wasteful running expenses.

One cause of the present unsuccessfulness in business arises from the huge commissions paid the jobbers and go-betweens. We have seen an immense sewing machine company fail, and probably if we will look into the way it was conducted we shall find that the cost of the sewing machine was hardly ten dollars, and that by the time the unfortunate consumer received it, he was paying forty to fifty dollars for it. It is the same way with life insurance all over this country. Not content with making a reasonable amount of obligations, the particular companies want to put two hundred million dollars on as the amount of their risks, and they put in as their assets costly edifices, reared in distant states and nations, which in case of ruin would bring but little money. If one looks around him in this world's fair he will see that the American system of paying commissions has made it almost impossible for the million of consumers to obtain that which they want at a moderate price. Part of this is due to one having so much country to cover. All plumbers' supplies, including bathtubs and closets, are furnished to the intermediaries at from forty to sixty per cent. off an enormous amount for the ultimate consumer to pay. The wind-mill men who go over this country putting up windmills and gin wheels to pump water from holes and ditches, will purchase in the next town to the summer their iron pipes, and charge for it at forty per cent. upon what they paid, whereas the consumer himself could go into the same town and buy the pipe commission off. Looking in Chicago a solid set of interesting appliances, a lady entered and asked its price. "We cannot sell it to you," said the clerk, not meaning the price. "I did not ask that," said the woman; "there you see price upon it." "You go to somebody in the trade, and tell them to come here and buy it," remarked the merchant, "and then you can buy it from that person at whatever he will sell it to you for. Percentage you will find some one who will not charge you the fifty per cent. commission we allow them."

Coming upon Mr. McVicker, the veteran theater manager, one day, when an oriental tanker had run away from his bank and either drowned himself or straightened his features as a disguise, I said to McVicker: "What is the trouble with the financial times?" "Apes," replied McVicker, promptly.

"Yes, apes. We have been growing a large crop of millionaires in this country in the past twenty years. For these genuine millionaires there are so many ape millionaires, fellows who play the millionaires act without any sense or basis, mere imitators, like the ape shaving himself when he sees his master do it. The failures now going on are the failures of the apes."

"Well," said a person standing by, "knowledge is power, after all. The people are finding out that not even stock exchanges register facts. I know of a certain big stock, or series of stocks, which was deliberately listed upon a stock exchange, and that stock exchange created, or manipulated, to keep the figure marked up. As long as the quotations were high and the stock was bringing six hundred per cent. more than it cost, they could, of course, pay respectable dividends, but that did not validate the bottom fact that the exchange itself was a vehicle and prostitute for the scheme. They kept on paying dividends and marking up the stock until tight times came, and then it was found that the banks would not lend on that stock at all. The banks knew the difference between a real exchange and a fictitious exchange or house."

The proportion of eastern people coming out here do not like the landscape. They say the lake is too flat, the land is too flat and nothing stands up high but some fifteen and twenty-story buildings. On my way home from Chicago a fortnight past, I met a man from Washington, city, who lived in Nebraska. He had with him a young wife from the valley of Virginia, who had drooping, consumption and everything, and had to be carried in a chair. "Ah," said the man returning home, "that shows how uncertain this life is. I lived in Washington city and I ran into congestive chills, so that I was a skeleton, and my doctor said to me: 'You have got to go out west, or you will die.' My wife was then the stout member of the family. I went to Nebraska and settled at Bent Bow. The change of climate drove away the chills. I lived in the open air and began to raise pigs. I got a pair of fine hogs and had two or three hundred pigs, and got good prices for them. Unfortunately, a drought came along and put up the price of pig food like others. I cut off my pigs in number, and don't I wish I hadn't? Pigs today rule the world. Everything goes down but pigs, and they grow up."

AMERICAN ART.

What Can Be Seen of It in Chicago and the Fair.

The world's fair is an undertaking to see, and without some key to its usefulness dribbles through the mind like running water. The Americans are quite desirous to make up to the eyes nations in the line of art. In point of fact, we do as much for art as a mercantile investment as any other nation, almost as. Hitherto most of our public statues have been made upon the spur of the moment, and most of them go to the honor of soldiers rather than men of ideas. I notice in Chicago some verities of statuary. Here is an interesting monument by an Irishman, of an Indian family, as they lived, stretching out, upon the site of Chicago, when the little river, the lake with nothing to see but the outlines of a little black-house, the site of which is marked at the last before going out of Chicago river, and I see it every day, with a picture of the old fort, in marble, and a full account beneath it. Mr. Paulsen and Mr.

have his monument to commemorate the massacre of the garrison of this fort, who were pursued down the lake or southwest, and in the rear of his home were put to death. This also is a good subject for a monument. Then, there is a statue out here of La Salle the Voyager, who discovered the route from Niagara Falls through Chicago to Texas. I think, also, that a copy of the Lief Eriksson statue in Boston should be here. The good old man who delivered the address at the raising of that statue and became the chief antiquary concerning the Norsemen in America, Prof. Horsford, I talked with at the Virginia hotel, Chicago, when the fair was opened in October last. He showed me his models from the king of Denmark for having located the spot on Charles river, Massachusetts, where Eriksson built his town. I did not know that Mr. Horsford was dead.

STATUE OF LA SALLE.

until I saw it in a little guide book describing the Rabida convent, and he died last spring. The statue of Lincoln, by St. Gaudens, in Chicago, is generally regarded as the most original and effective monument extant of that great man. Not far from it is a very imposing equestrian statue of Grant, overlooking the lake, one of the largest statues in this country. On the front of the same lake, some four miles distant, is the statue of Stephen A. Douglas, on the summit of a high monument. Between the two is the recently erected statue of Columbus. The statue of the Republic will also, I understand, be the model for numerous sculptural creations to come. In another part of the town is a statue of Columbus when he was a student at the University of Pavia. The Germans have erected a statue of one of their home poets in a park in Chicago. Statues of several benefactors of the town are to be found here and there. I recite these works to show that the spirit of statuary has gone far west.

While looking through the picture galleries it seemed to me that the great body of the Americans wanted some key to the successful painters who had made their mark. I passed along with a pair of foreign artists and picked up these points about some of the men we read of.

Laurence Alma Tadema was born in old Friesland, Holland, in 1836, fifty-seven years ago; was a pupil of Baron Leys at Antwerp, and from youth busied himself with Roman and Egyptian antiquities, things much affected by the English, who liken themselves to the Romans and from Shakespeare have robust models of Roman scenes. A London and a Roman mob are a good deal alike. He carried an English painter. Rembrandt was not more familiarly during than this Dutchman with so-called sacred and antique scenes; but Rembrandt had the humor of a Bacchus, the concentration of Vulcan; Tadema seems to be a scene setter and painter, his meritorious work presently to be hauled apart, the vestures and silver gods, hags and diaphanous to go presently to the property room. His wealth of particular scenes like a shop of antiques, the keeper whereof has no settled craft or line. Modern art thus surfeits us often with its case of classicism, like Schlemmer, the money-maker, digging up Agamemnon and his finger rings and lamps. Bartholdi was a pupil of Ary Scheffer, the Flemish Frenchman, who put old gold into painting and had the tableaux of history till they took the blue hue of the ghost's atmosphere on the sky-lines of Elnore. Bartholdi has been exhibiting since 1881—forty-one years. Some instinctive seizure of the French on good themes is a high department of their art. They are never in want of a subject, be it still or theatrical. Bartholdi has made the Gallic barbarian who resisted Caesar, Vercingetorix, live again, has revived old Lafayette, who is not popular in France because he did not force the enemy's center, fire two hundred cannons, dimes an ambassador, divorce his wife and kick the stage manager down the empire stairs. Now and then a French artist like Baudry declines a commission to paint some grand opera scene ceiling with peasant or atmospheric nudes. Bonnet came from Bayonne, born sixty years ago, and studied at Madrid under Madrazo, and was sent to Italy by friend.

STATUE OF BARTHOLDI.

Frederick A. Bridgman was born in Providence, R. I., in 1847, studied bank note engraving, went to the Brooklyn art schools, and at nineteen became a pupil of Gérôme, who was twenty-three years his senior. Gérôme entered Delacroix's studio in 1841. These two artists will be some centuries being displaced, and there is a resemblance in their methods. Gérôme seems the Euphorion son of Delacroix. Faust, he took the wife of Stevens as he would have a picture frame, or a house that away his friend's wife.

Julius Bretton, a Frenchman, was born where Walden is revisited against the empire. He studied at Prague and with Flourens, and threw himself into the Russian and old Bohemian themes. He is the revolutionary painter of Europe, what David was in the French revolution, the counterpart in American Robert or Rembrandt in American-Hungary. Since 1898 Bretton has been exhibiting. W. F. De Buss, born 1839, and M. P. H. De Buss, born 1859, were both Rotterdamers who settled in New York and painted American themes, showing the transatlantic or rather genuine character of Dutch art. Edward Defels is the son of Charles Marie Defels, a noted portrait painter, who died in 1884; the son was born in 1814, and bled lessons from his father and Delacroix, and began to show in 1839, and made popular portraits. Mariano Fortuny came from near Barcelona, Spain, born 1838, and was on Prim's staff in Morocco. He married Madrazo, the Spanish court painter's daughter, and between Rome, Granada and Morocco painted like Rubens in his day of wealth, a master of the novelistic themes, worldly priests, Moor judges, the insect in the man, and he painted the day he died of the Roman fever, a Walter Scott in the number of his parasites. Powell Frith is a Yorkshireman, born 1819, and produced "Derby Day" in 1864, the "Railway Station" in 1869, which brought him forty-five thousand dollars from an engraving publisher, who made eighty thousand dollars with it.

Cabanel, from the south of France, was sent to Rome at government expense to be educated after he had produced two notable pictures, and from painting tableaux he went into portraits, and became the favorite painter of Empress Eugenie; he made modern women Venuses, and so refined his flesh-tints that he approached insipidity, but he brought up a good many excellent students, for painters are known by their pupils as well as by their paintings.

Melissone came from Lyons, born the year before the fall of Napoleon Bonaparte. He chose genre subjects, and was both military and sentimental in his themes, and his paintings bounced up to high prices. An American from Cincinnati gave about $30,000 for one of his military pieces twenty-five years ago. Stewart, of New York, gave $60,000, it is believed, for one of his Napoleon pictures, on which he is said to have worked fifteen years, and which stands about the highest in size of any of his canvases. He had an accurate hand, and could therefore paint in small proportion with all the reality of one far-sighted, who sees things in distant perspective. All in all, he has been the most widely successful modern painter, and it is hard to believe that genre painters of the seventeenth or eighteenth century were any better than himself.

FREDERICK A. BRIDGMAN.

PAINTERS AND SCULPTORS.

Men Whose Names Are Familiar to Students of Art.

The French give out strong themes for their young art students, and Lefebvre, the exquisite draughtsman who painted the wonderful nude called "Truth," with the lamp, had to take his subject when a boy "The Death of Priam," thus inviting classical research. Knaus, a German who cut loose from the Düsseldorf school and initiated the French, among whom he lived eight years, has a strong reputation in this country, from the high world's fair statue of the Republic, prices some of his pictures have obtained, such as "The Holy Family," in the Metropolitan museum in New York. He was born in 1839. Nevill, whose battle pictures of the last French war have been immensely multiplied in photographs and colored copies, came from the Belgian end of France, and was born rich and elegantly educated, and entering a military school struck his professor with his genius in drawing. His family, however, did not want to see him an artist, and he entered a law school in Paris, but continued to sketch all the time, still among the military cadets. The artists tried to discourage his father from letting him come among them, but he took a prize in 1859, when he was twenty-three years old, and Eugene Delacroix, an eminent artist, took a fancy to him, and he obtained a commission to paint Garibaldi, which he did very badly, but at twenty-five one of his soldier pictures pleased the French, though he had to make woodcuts for a living after he left his father's house, and drew for most of the French illustrated papers. Mr. Walters, of Baltimore, and other Americans have purchased his pictures, which are strong in their physiognomy and gesture.

STATUE OF KNAUS.

Tyron, whose pictures we see with admiration of French pastoral scenes, sheep, landscapes, etc., was intended by his parents to be a painter of powerboats, but he actually went into the porcelain factory at Sèvres, which gives such a factory exhibit here, but he preferred a studio in France, and became a traveling Frenchman and Italian.

There are three painters of different nations whose names are pronounced by the public "Millay." The English painter, Millais, of these, is about sixty-five years old, and was a pupil of the wife of Ruskin. Though born in Southampton, he roved away his youth in France and the Channel islands, and began to paint tableaux, such as "Pizarro, the Huguenot," Joan of Arc, etc. The English, on the lookout for a great painter, took very kindly to him, and his engravings are found throughout the British homes everywhere. He paints portraits which are thought to be profound, and seldom gets less than ten thousand dollars apiece for them. He is what is known as a Pre-Raphaelite painter.

The French Millet died at the age of sixty-four, subsequent to the German invasion of France, and was brought up by Paul Delacroix. He was of nine children and had no means, and a priest, who was a relative, brought him up. He knew many a cold and hungry day, but he had good health, and he began to paint the people he knew about—the peasants, the plowmen and the shepherd. He only painted about eighty pictures in thirty-one years, thought much over his themes, looked well to the sentiment, had no models, worked from the memory and the observation, and his pictures at his death sold for $64,000, most of them unfinished. At another sale the amount realized was about $95,000, and only one foreigner out of twenty purchasers bought anything. The French are well aware of the value of paintings to be treasured up and sold at long subsequent dates.

Francis D. Millet is an American, who studies at Antwerp, took prizes and received important orders from America, and is not only a good artist, but a bright newspaper correspondent.

Whistler, who is a good deal talked about for his pertinacity in exhibiting abroad, came from Lowell, Mass., and his father, an engineer, took him to Russia when a child, and he returned and was educated at West Point and moved to England at twenty-one, studied in Paris, and began to give exhibitions of his own twenty years ago. The furious critic, Ruskin, said of Whistler that he was a connoisseur who asked two hundred guineas for flinging a pot of paint in the public's face. Whistler said him for libel and got one farthing damages. The queen of England, however, bought a collection of his sketches, and the British museum bought others, and he has gone on, indifferent to attack, so that his name at least is widely recognized.

One of the most ambitious of American artists is Charles Sprague Pearce, a Boston man, who studied painting in Paris and visited Africa, Algiers, etc. He realizes some of the bolder artists of the first part of our century who undertook to carry American art into historical and spiritual fields.

Ridgway Knight, who paints charming pictures of French peasant scenes, with sentiment, went from Pennsylvania to France twenty-one years ago, and was one of Meissonnier's pupils.

The Austrians make much of Hans Makart, their great national painter, who lost his mind some years back. He was born in the south of Austria in 1840, studied at Munich under Piloty, who painted historical tableaux, and having a brilliant pencil his Venetian pictures of Catherine Casanova was sold for twelve thousand dollars. Some call him the Richard Wagner of German painters. He is the Austrian Titian.

There are three painters of different nations whose names are pronounced by the public "Millay." The English painter, Millais, of these, is about sixty-five years old, and was a pupil of the wife of Ruskin. Though born in Southampton, he roved away his youth in France and the Channel islands, and began to paint tableaux, such as "Pizarro, the Huguenot," Joan of Arc, etc. The English, on the lookout for a great painter, took very kindly to him, and his engravings are found throughout the British homes everywhere. He paints portraits which are thought to be profound, and seldom gets less than ten thousand dollars apiece for them. He is what is known as a Pre-Raphaelite painter.

The French Millet died at the age of sixty-four, subsequent to the German invasion of France, and was brought up by Paul Delacroix. He was of nine children and had no means, and a priest, who was a relative, brought him up. He knew many a cold and hungry day, but he had good health, and he began to paint the people he knew about—the peasants, the plowmen and the shepherd. He only painted about eighty pictures in thirty-one years, thought much over his themes, looked well to the sentiment, had no models, worked from the memory and the observation, and his pictures at his death sold for $64,000, most of them unfinished. At another sale the amount realized was about $95,000, and only one foreigner out of twenty purchasers bought anything. The French are well aware of the value of paintings to be treasured up and sold at long subsequent dates.

Francis D. Millet is an American, who studies at Antwerp, took prizes and received important orders from America, and is not only a good artist, but a bright newspaper correspondent.

Whistler, who is a good deal talked about for his pertinacity in exhibiting abroad, came from Lowell, Mass., and his father, an engineer, took him to Russia when a child, and he returned and was educated at West Point and moved to England at twenty-one, studied in Paris, and began to give exhibitions of his own twenty years ago. The furious critic, Ruskin, said of Whistler that he was a connoisseur who asked two hundred guineas for flinging a pot of paint in the public's face. Whistler said him for libel and got one farthing damages. The queen of England, however, bought a collection of his sketches, and the British museum bought others, and he has gone on, indifferent to attack, so that his name at least is widely recognized.

One of the most ambitious of American artists is Charles Sprague Pearce, a Boston man, who studied painting in Paris and visited Africa, Algiers, etc. He realizes some of the bolder artists of the first part of our century who undertook to carry American art into historical and spiritual fields.

Ridgway Knight, who paints charming pictures of French peasant scenes, with sentiment, went from Pennsylvania to France twenty-one years ago, and was one of Meissonnier's pupils.

The Austrians make much of Hans Makart, their great national painter, who lost his mind some years back. He was born in the south of Austria in 1840, studied at Munich under Piloty, who painted historical tableaux, and having a brilliant pencil his Venetian pictures of Catherine Casanova was sold for twelve thousand dollars. Some call him the Richard Wagner of German painters. He is the Austrian Titian.

There are three painters of different nations whose names are pronounced by the public "Millay." The English painter, Millais, of these, is about sixty-five years old, and was a pupil of the wife of Ruskin. Though born in Southampton, he roved away his youth in France and the Channel islands, and began to paint tableaux, such as "Pizarro, the Huguenot," Joan of Arc, etc. The English, on the lookout for a great painter, took very kindly to him, and his engravings are found throughout the British homes everywhere. He paints portraits which are thought to be profound, and seldom gets less than ten thousand dollars apiece for them. He is what is known as a Pre-Raphaelite painter.

The French Millet died at the age of sixty-four, subsequent to the German invasion of France, and was brought up by Paul Delacroix. He was of nine children and had no means, and a priest, who was a relative, brought him up. He knew many a cold and hungry day, but he had good health, and he began to paint the people he knew about—the peasants, the plowmen and the shepherd. He only painted about eighty pictures in thirty-one years, thought much over his themes, looked well to the sentiment, had no models, worked from the memory and the observation, and his pictures at his death sold for $64,000, most of them unfinished. At another sale the amount realized was about $95,000, and only one foreigner out of twenty purchasers bought anything. The French are well aware of the value of paintings to be treasured up and sold at long subsequent dates.

Francis D. Millet is an American, who studies at Antwerp, took prizes and received important orders from America, and is not only a good artist, but a bright newspaper correspondent.

Whistler, who is a good deal talked about for his pertinacity in exhibiting abroad, came from Lowell, Mass., and his father, an engineer, took him to Russia when a child, and he returned and was educated at West Point and moved to England at twenty-one, studied in Paris, and began to give exhibitions of his own twenty years ago. The furious critic, Ruskin, said of Whistler that he was a connoisseur who asked two hundred guineas for flinging a pot of paint in the public's face. Whistler said him for libel and got one farthing damages. The queen of England, however, bought a collection of his sketches, and the British museum bought others, and he has gone on, indifferent to attack, so that his name at least is widely recognized.

One of the most ambitious of American artists is Charles Sprague Pearce, a Boston man, who studied painting in Paris and visited Africa, Algiers, etc. He realizes some of the bolder artists of the first part of our century who undertook to carry American art into historical and spiritual fields.

Ridgway Knight, who paints charming pictures of French peasant scenes, with sentiment, went from Pennsylvania to France twenty-one years ago, and was one of Meissonnier's pupils.

The Austrians make much of Hans Makart, their great national painter, who lost his mind some years back. He was born in the south of Austria in 1840, studied at Munich under Piloty, who painted historical tableaux, and having a brilliant pencil his Venetian pictures of Catherine Casanova was sold for twelve thousand dollars. Some call him the Richard Wagner of German painters. He is the Austrian Titian.

There are three painters of different nations whose names are pronounced by the public "Millay." The English painter, Millais, of these, is about sixty-five years old, and was a pupil of the wife of Ruskin. Though born in Southampton, he roved away his youth in France and the Channel islands, and began to paint tableaux, such as "Pizarro, the Huguenot," Joan of Arc, etc. The English, on the lookout for a great painter, took very kindly to him, and his engravings are found throughout the British homes everywhere. He paints portraits which are thought to be profound, and seldom gets less than ten thousand dollars apiece for them. He is what is known as a Pre-Raphaelite painter.

The French Millet died at the age of sixty-four, subsequent to the German invasion of France, and was brought up by Paul Delacroix. He was of nine children and had no means, and a priest, who was a relative, brought him up. He knew many a cold and hungry day, but he had good health, and he began to paint the people he knew about—the peasants, the plowmen and the shepherd. He only painted about eighty pictures in thirty-one years, thought much over his themes, looked well to the sentiment, had no models, worked from the memory and the observation, and his pictures at his death sold for $64,000, most of them unfinished. At another sale the amount realized was about $95,000, and only one foreigner out of twenty purchasers bought anything. The French are well aware of the value of paintings to be treasured up and sold at long subsequent dates.

Francis D. Millet is an American, who studies at Antwerp, took prizes and received important orders from America, and is not only a good artist, but a bright newspaper correspondent.

Whistler, who is a good deal talked about for his pertinacity in exhibiting abroad, came from Lowell, Mass., and his father, an engineer, took him to Russia when a child, and he returned and was educated at West Point and moved to England at twenty-one, studied in Paris, and began to give exhibitions of his own twenty years ago. The furious critic, Ruskin, said of Whistler that he was a connoisseur who asked two hundred guineas for flinging a pot of paint in the public's face. Whistler said him for libel and got one farthing damages. The queen of England, however, bought a collection of his sketches, and the British museum bought others, and he has gone on, indifferent to attack, so that his name at least is widely recognized.

One of the most ambitious of American artists is Charles Sprague Pearce, a Boston man, who studied painting in Paris and visited Africa, Algiers, etc. He realizes some of the bolder artists of the first part of our century who undertook to carry American art into historical and spiritual fields.

Ridgway Knight, who paints charming pictures of French peasant scenes, with sentiment, went from Pennsylvania to France twenty-one years ago, and was one of Meissonnier's pupils.

The Austrians make much of Hans Makart, their great national painter, who lost his mind some years back. He was born in the south of Austria in 1840, studied at Munich under Piloty, who painted historical tableaux, and having a brilliant pencil his Venetian pictures of Catherine Casanova was sold for twelve thousand dollars. Some call him the Richard Wagner of German painters. He is the Austrian Titian.

There are three painters of different nations whose names are pronounced by the public "Millay." The English painter, Millais, of these, is about sixty-five years old, and was a pupil of the wife of Ruskin. Though born in Southampton, he roved away his youth in France and the Channel islands, and began to paint tableaux, such as "Pizarro, the Huguenot," Joan of Arc, etc. The English, on the lookout for a great painter, took very kindly to him, and his engravings are found throughout the British homes everywhere. He paints portraits which are thought to be profound, and seldom gets less than ten thousand dollars apiece for them. He is what is known as a Pre-Raphaelite painter.

The French Millet died at the age of sixty-four, subsequent to the German invasion of France, and was brought up by Paul Delacroix. He was of nine children and had no means, and a priest, who was a relative, brought him up. He knew many a cold and hungry day, but he had good health, and he began to paint the people he knew about—the peasants, the plowmen and the shepherd. He only painted about eighty pictures in thirty-one years, thought much over his themes, looked well to the sentiment, had no models, worked from the memory and the observation, and his pictures at his death sold for $64,000, most of them unfinished. At another sale the amount realized was about $95,000, and only one foreigner out of twenty purchasers bought anything. The French are well aware of the value of paintings to be treasured up and sold at long subsequent dates.

Francis D. Millet is an American, who studies at Antwerp, took prizes and received important orders from America, and is not only a good artist, but a bright newspaper correspondent.

Whistler, who is a good deal talked about for his pertinacity in exhibiting abroad, came from Lowell, Mass., and his father, an engineer, took him to Russia when a child, and he returned and was educated at West Point and moved to England at twenty-one, studied in Paris, and began to give exhibitions of his own twenty years ago. The furious critic, Ruskin, said of Whistler that he was a connoisseur who asked two hundred guineas for flinging a pot of paint in the public's face. Whistler said him for libel and got one farthing damages. The queen of England, however, bought a collection of his sketches, and the British museum bought others, and he has gone on, indifferent to attack, so that his name at least is widely recognized.

One of the most ambitious of American artists is Charles Sprague Pearce, a Boston man, who studied painting in Paris and visited Africa, Algiers, etc. He realizes some of the bolder artists of the first part of our century who undertook to carry American art into historical and spiritual fields.

Ridgway Knight, who paints charming pictures of French peasant scenes, with sentiment, went from Pennsylvania to France twenty-one years ago, and was one of Meissonnier's pupils.

The English painter, Millais, of these, is about sixty-five years old, and was a pupil of the wife of Ruskin. Though born in Southampton, he roved away his youth in France and the Channel islands, and began to paint tableaux, such as "Pizarro, the Huguenot," Joan of Arc, etc. The English, on the lookout for a great painter, took very kindly to him, and his engravings are found throughout the British homes everywhere. He paints portraits which are thought to be profound, and seldom gets less than ten thousand dollars apiece for them. He is what is known as a Pre-Raphaelite painter.

The French Millet died at the age of sixty-four, subsequent to the German invasion of France, and was brought up by Paul Delacroix. He was of nine children and had no means, and a priest, who was a relative, brought him up. He knew many a cold and hungry day, but he had good health, and he began to paint the people he knew about—the peasants, the plowmen and the shepherd. He only painted about eighty pictures in thirty-one years, thought much over his themes, looked well to the sentiment, had no models, worked from the memory and the observation, and his pictures at his death sold for $64,000, most of them unfinished. At another sale the amount realized was about $95,000, and only one foreigner out of twenty purchasers bought anything. The French are well aware of the value of paintings to be treasured up and sold at long subsequent dates.

Francis D. Millet is an American, who studies at Antwerp, took prizes and received important orders from America, and is not only a good artist, but a bright newspaper correspondent.

Whistler, who is a good deal talked about for his pertinacity in exhibiting abroad, came from Lowell, Mass., and his father, an engineer, took him to Russia when a child, and he returned and was educated at West Point and moved to England at twenty-one, studied in Paris, and began to give exhibitions of his own twenty years ago. The furious critic, Ruskin, said of Whistler that he was a connoisseur who asked two hundred guineas for flinging a pot of paint in the public's face. Whistler said him for libel and got one farthing damages. The queen of England, however, bought a collection of his sketches, and the British museum bought others, and he has gone on, indifferent to attack, so that his name at least is widely recognized.

One of the most ambitious of American artists is Charles Sprague Pearce, a Boston man, who studied painting in Paris and visited Africa, Algiers, etc. He realizes some of the bolder artists of the first part of our century who undertook to carry American art into historical and spiritual fields.

Ridgway Knight, who paints charming pictures of French peasant scenes, with sentiment, went from Pennsylvania to France twenty-one years ago, and was one of Meissonnier's pupils.

The Austrians make much of Hans Makart, their great national painter, who lost his mind some years back. He was born in the south of Austria in 1840, studied at Munich under Piloty, who painted historical tableaux, and having a brilliant pencil his Venetian pictures of Catherine Casanova was sold for twelve thousand dollars. Some call him the Richard Wagner of German painters. He is the Austrian Titian.

There are three painters of different nations whose names are pronounced by the public "Millay." The English painter, Millais, of these, is about sixty-five years old, and was a pupil of the wife of Ruskin. Though born in Southampton, he roved away his youth in France and the Channel islands, and began to paint tableaux, such as "Pizarro, the Huguenot," Joan of Arc, etc. The English, on the lookout for a great painter, took very kindly to him, and his engravings are found throughout the British homes everywhere. He paints portraits which are thought to be profound, and seldom gets less than ten thousand dollars apiece for them. He is what is known as a Pre-Raphaelite painter.

The French Millet died at the age of sixty-four, subsequent to the German invasion of France, and was brought up by Paul Delacroix. He was of nine children and had no means, and a priest, who was a relative, brought him up. He knew many a cold and hungry day, but he had good health, and he began to paint the people he knew about—the peasants, the plowmen and the shepherd. He only painted about eighty pictures in thirty-one years, thought much over his themes, looked well to the sentiment, had no models, worked from the memory and the observation, and his pictures at his death sold for $64,000, most of them unfinished. At another sale the amount realized was about $95,000, and only one foreigner out of twenty purchasers bought anything. The French are well aware of the value of paintings to be treasured up and sold at long subsequent dates.

Francis D. Millet is an American, who studies at Antwerp, took prizes and received important orders from America, and is not only a good artist, but a bright newspaper correspondent.

Whistler, who is a good deal talked about for his pertinacity in exhibiting abroad, came from Lowell, Mass., and his father, an engineer, took him to Russia when a child, and he returned and was educated at West Point and moved to England at twenty-one, studied in Paris, and began to give exhibitions of his own twenty years ago. The furious critic, Ruskin, said of Whistler that he was a connoisseur who asked two hundred guineas for flinging a pot of paint in the public's face. Whistler said him for libel and got one farthing damages. The queen of England, however, bought a collection of his sketches, and the British museum bought others, and he has gone on, indifferent to attack, so that his name at least is widely recognized.

One of the most ambitious of American artists is Charles Sprague Pearce, a Boston man, who studied painting in Paris and visited Africa, Algiers, etc. He realizes some of the bolder artists of the first part of our century who undertook to carry American art into historical and spiritual fields.

Ridgway Knight, who paints charming pictures of French peasant scenes, with sentiment, went from Pennsylvania to France twenty-one years ago, and was one of Meissonnier's pupils.

The